Hidden in Plain Sight

A face appears through layers of plastic and objects.

A domestic field note within the ongoing Menagerie.

This image emerged during an ordinary moment—
the handling and organizing of a plastic bag and household items.

Through the translucent layering, a face-like form appears:
two darker shapes resembling eyes,
and a central structure suggesting a nose.

The effect is subtle, and slightly unexpected.

Unlike landscape-based entries in this series,
this image highlights how perception can organize even the most familiar materials into something recognizable.

Whether seen as coincidence, pattern, or presence,
the image is offered without conclusion.

What do you see?
